Education Matters: Empowering Young People to Make Healthier Choices

October
19-20, 2011
Berlin,
Germany

Introduction

In 2011 half of the world's population is under the age of 25. This includes the largest-ever generation of adolescents who are, or will be soon, of reproductive age, ready to become sexually active or to establish their own families. Significantly, millions of these young people are challenged by prospects of early marriage and childbearing, incomplete education, and the threat of HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases.

Young people's right to lead a healthy life, including the right to be informed on how to protect themselves against unwanted pregnancies, and sexually transmitted infections including HIV is enfranchised in many human rights declarations. To realize these rights, young people need to be empowered by providing them with knowledge, skills, attitudes and values in order to make informed and self-determined choices. Girls need to learn to negotiate relationships and safer sexual practices and boys need to learn how to respect the girls' will and take care for themselves and their partners. Currently, specifically the emotional, social and also the health needs of young people are too often not fully met; the insufficient and often misleading information on reproductive health paired with youth unfriendly family planning services, for example, are key contributing factors in sexually transmitted infections, unwanted pregnancies or unsafe abortions and in high maternal mortality rates.

The current international political environment now provides good opportunities for the promotion of Sexual and Reproductive Health (SRH) educational initiatives. The UN Secretary General's Global Strategy for Women's and Children's Health as well as the G8 Muskoka Initiative have significantly brought up the issue of maternal health. In addition, several donors have put Sexual and Reproductive Health Rights (SRHR) high on their agenda again, such as the German government with its new Initiative on „Rights-based Family Planning and Maternal Health“.

This year's International Dialogue will make use of the ongoing international discussions and direct the political attention to the important link between SRHR and education.

- ▶ It will discuss good practices, national standards and curricula, new developments and joint activities in the fields of general formal as well as informal sexuality education.
- ▶ It will gather evidence from selected countries and identify practical ways to use the findings of the Dialogue to catalyze wider political dialogue and action.

- ▶ It will come up with concrete recommendations for partner governments, donors, non-state-actors and experts how to more effectively use education initiatives to strengthen SRHR in general as well as specifically in the selected countries.

It will also take into account controversial issues such as sexuality education with young age groups and discuss new kinds of methodologies and innovative approaches in order to reach out to target groups. More generally, the conference will also cover issues such as vocational training, the link to youth friendly services and the training of health care providers, teachers and communicators. Finally, it will discuss how overall education can empower young people and make them realize their reproductive rights.
